And, sadly, that means understanding how awful everything is in the real world, since this is the world of media that people (the majority of them being sick Trumpists) read and listen to. It goes without saying that this administration is a literal nightmare of a place to work. Literally everyone in the administration has screwed over every single journalist who tries to cover this administration, and several of them have committed felonies. If you haven't heard, in February of this year, the former WH communications director Hope Hicks was charged by the SDNY for lying to the FBI, and both Trump's former personal lawyer, Michael Cohen, and his campaign manager, Paul Manafort, are reportedly being investigated by the FBI for possible work-related bank fraud in connection with the infamous Trump campaign ad and Moscow money laundering scandal. Some of this has made its way into the mainstream, with NY Times media critic Jim Rutenberg examining the troubling living conditions of journalists in the White House in this piece. Some of the issues he outlines are definitely true: junior WH staffers don't get to have their own offices, and they're crammed into tiny cubicles they can't leave. Coverage of the president's vague statements is never given the attention they deserve because a slew of White

House flacks have to make sure to walk out and tell reporters what the president told them he said. But the biggest takeaway from this piece — which, incidentally, comes on the heels of an NPR report describing how the White House has stopped sending out press releases — is that the media can still be a force for good: that it can stand up to the White House
